Chapter 1 by Wander

People often say we're all born to do something. Not ever finds what it is they do or can do but a young teen girl has always been afraid that her time will never come. Always missing due dates for assignments, never being on time to curfew, getting late to meetings with her friends, class going by slow on a test day and agonizing minutes during parent lectures.

Time always seemed against her, always too fast or too slow. She never had a break, but that's because there was something she should do. Always always, she never had a chance.

Any time, any place, any one. Time forcibly reverses and yanks her along for the ride.

Chapter 2 by avianwings

She was pulled to a time before she was a teen -- before things got hectic. She still had school, tutor, and all the other things her parents had given her when she was young, but now she also had experience.

Experience told her she didn't want this. At least, not this far. She didn't want to go through the stress of transitioning into high school again, or the losing of her friend, or even just having to live through the same lessons again. She knew what happens in Romeo and Juliet, she knew that $x + 3 = 6$ means that x is three, she knew she had to take Mr. Weedle's class again, she'd explode.

She had to find what pulled her back, even if it meant being late for everything in this timeline, too.
